We were not able to gain access to that screen. The cowlings were crunched and the nose was sitting on pallets. The screen in the picture is the selector screen. We were able to access both tanks and we found no debris. It will take a lot more time if you want to get to the screen on the fuel controller. We were also able to determine that the engine had continuity with the crankshaft and all pistons and all valves.

Curt,

Were you able to look at the final fuel screen before the manifold valve? The one on the mixture control? Was that one also obstructed?

Thanks,
Josh

Josh,

Here are some pictures of the debris in the fuel system. The first two pictures are of the screen at the fuel selector and the last is from when they opened the fuel manifold up. I know you talked to Curt about it, if you need anything else let us know.
