

On 23 September 2018, I was the First Officer on United Flight 138 from Newark, NJ to Keflavik, Iceland. During cruise flight, approximately 1.5 hours into the flight and after the first meal service, the Lead Flight Attendant entered the flight deck as part of an aircrew relief break. The Flight Attendant told the Captain and I that the caterer had hit his foot with a cart, and that his foot hurt. We discussed other topics as well. After a few minutes, he departed the flight deck to continue his inflight duties. After landing, during the walk through the airport to crew transportation, the flight attendant was limping and stated his foot still hurt. The crew checked into the crew rest hotel. I saw the flight attendant the next morning at the hotel restaurant, and he stated that he went to the ER to have his foot X-Rayed. He said his foot was broken, and he would not be returning with us on the flight.
